This building is historically known as the Hadlock Methodist Church. Built in 1903, it was operated as a church for the community of Hadlock until somewhere in the 1950's.

The church, or now converted house, is a steeply gabled wood stucture forming an L-shape. In the corner of the L is the steeple that rises above the roof line. Entrance to the stucture is through the bottom portion of the steeple. Immediately upon entrance to the structure, straight ahead was the Sunday school room now converted into the kitchen. To the right upon entrance, is the main hall for the congregation. To the rear of the building was another rear entrance where an outhouse once was located nearby.

The old church has now been converted into a living residence. The structural quality of the building has remained virtually unchanged. Only the interior of the building has been altered in any way. Here on the inside, a sleeping loft has been built. Originally the building had high ceilings and could have been considered a 1½ story structure.

8. SIGNIFICANCE

Specific dates 1903

Builder/Architect

a. History The community of Port Hadlock became firmly established along with the industrial activities of the Washington Mill Company. Around the turn of the century, the community wa established enough to warrent the building of a permanent church although services of some sort were most likely held before the construction of this church.

This church was one Methodist Church out of a syndicate of Methodist Churches in the area. Along with the church established at Chimacum, community members shared the services of a travelling minister, who would be at one church one week, and at the other the next. In the 1950's, the churches of Hadlock and Chimacum combined forming the the Community Methodist Church that still is in existence today. The bell that once swung in the steeple of the Hadlock church, along with some pews and other items, were moved to the new church.

b. Evaluation of Significance

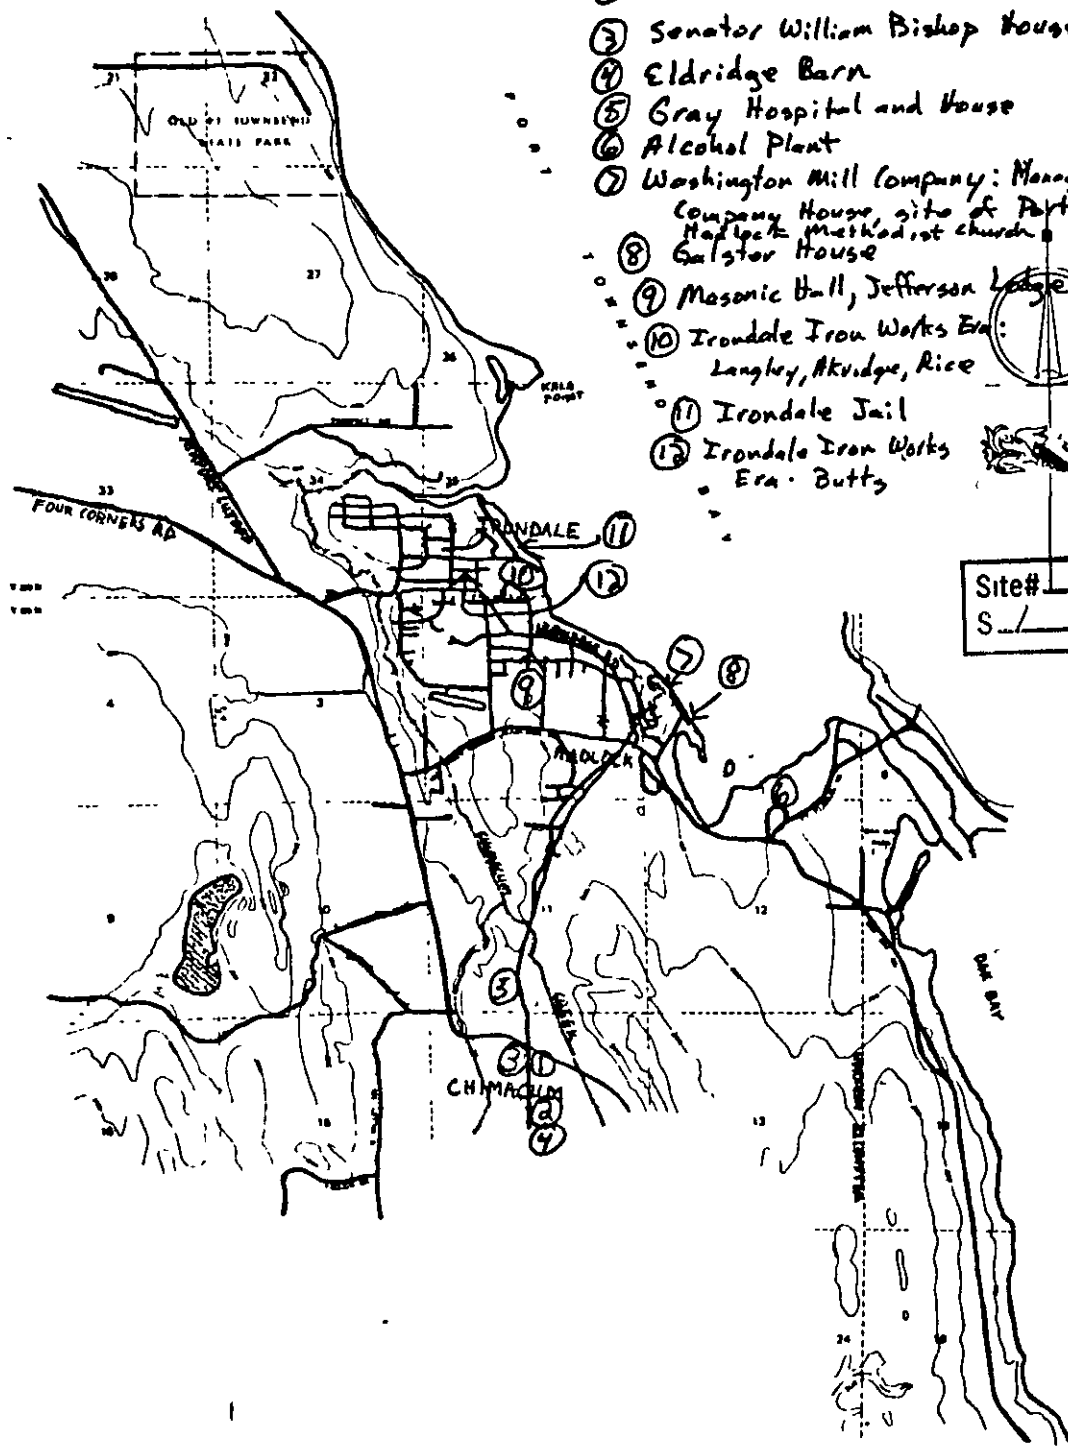

When the community of Hadlock saw its rapid development, many people came to the area, along with numerous commercial enterprises. The strength of the community lies, many would say, with the church. The strength of the community must have been bolstered around 1903 because this church and several new residences were built during this year.
